Excerpt: .the archduke continued in his devotions for another rapt five minutes. Then he slowly rose, his face pale and twitching. My salute he answered by a motion bidding me to approach. The emperor has just sent me word that war was declared on Russia two hours ago, he said gravely and in a low tense voice. And your imperial highness has just said a prayer for the success of the Austro-Hungarian arms? I ventured to remark. The archduke shook his head. No, not that, he then murmured, as though to himself. I have prayed to God for peace. I fear it will be an awful war, a long war--weary months, perhaps years. Years? I said. Yes, years--I am afraid so--years. And with that he dismissed me. Years, he had said, years. I think he was about the only one in Vienna whose ideas grasped...
