Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: . without a smile, again came to the rescue, saying-- We are very much obliged to you--for I find I must thank you in the name of my daughters--we are very much obliged to you, Mrs. Wilde; but, at the same time, I must say that I don t at all like the idea of their taking those beautiful dogs with them to the school: they have not, I am sure, any suitable place to put them there. Perhaps they might soon be broken, and only think what a pity that would be! But you have kindly given them to them; and, as it seems my daughters do not quickly find words to thank you, I think I must speak for them, and tell you that they gratefully accept them, and are much obliged to you for the kind feeling you have shown in this instance, as well as many others, during their stay here. But now, as the dogs belong to them, you see, I may also be allowed to give an opinion in the matter; and, therefore, I beg you to let them remain here at present, and I am sure you will take care of them for the sake of the girls. Besides, he added, you seem to feel so much kind partiality for my daughters, that I can t but think you will like to have the keeping of something belonging to them--is it not so? Well, now! raily I never seed...
