PAET V EXPOSITORY OUTLINES Our concluding chapter has been reserved for one or two sample expository outlines that may prove helpful as suggestions to inexperienced beginners. The first is drawn from the author s own store, and the second is that of Pastor F. E. Marsh, of Sunderland, England, which has come under the author s observation and affords a good illustration of another variety of the species. The principle on which the first-named was obtained was that explained in the previous chapters. The synthetic reading How Obtained, . J, .6 of Komans led to certain discoveries, as follows: (1) That epistle contains a single theme, viz., the gift of God s righteousness to men. (2) This theme is developed along three main lines: its necessity, its nature, and its effect upon man. (3) Its effect upon man is developed again along three lines: his relations to God, his own experience, and his relations to others. (4) The last-named subdivision (his relations to others) covers chapters 12-16, and expands the idea socially, politically, and ecclesiastically. Some time before this final thought was arrived at, the consideration of the epistle had The strong and already yielded material for sevtneweaic eral exp08it0ry discourses, but it was conceived that still a good one of a very practical order lay embedded, say, in chapters 13: 8 to 15: 7, where the inspired writer is dealing with the Christian in his church or ecclesiastical relations. A sample better...
