Excerpt: . . . disturbances, all of which were of Precambrian time. It is further to be remembered that geologists agree that these diastrophic movements, especially those at the end of the Archeozoic time, extended over an immense length of time; and those that involved the Archean rocks were worldwide. We see then before us the algebraic sum of the various diastrophic movements that successively disturbed the Precambrian rocks. If then, notwithstanding these facts that greatly complicate the problem of Precambrian diastrophism, we shall find that the directive lines of the Precambrian diastrophic movements, as expressed in the folding and foliation of all rocks and the strike of the eruptive bodies, present a striking uniformity of direction over tracts of continental size, it is to be inferred that these tracts responded as units for very long intervals of time, if not continuously, to all diastrophic forces. After these preliminary discussions of the bearing of the folded structures of the Precambrian rocks on the probability of their indicating continental areas of the earliest recognizable surface of our earth, we can turn to the evidence that is found in the literature of such folds and their principal directions. Description of Precambrian Fold Systems In an attempt to trace out the primary direction of folding of the Precambrian rocks it is necessary to exclude: 1 All areas of metamorphic rocks which are either proved to be or suspected of being younger than Precambrian age; such as are found in Greece, Asia...
